Title Register Restrictions

The owner must not build any part of a structure (except for small features like bay windows or porches) closer to the road than the established building line.

No main or wing walls of any building can be built within four feet of the northern or southern boundaries.

The owner must maintain a sturdy boundary fence or wall. Any fence or wall between the house and the road must not be taller than four feet, and rear fences must not exceed six feet.

The property cannot be used for burning bricks, tiles, or clay, or for any activity that causes a nuisance or annoyance to neighbours.

The land is restricted to being used for a single detached house or a pair of semi-detached houses, and plans for any new buildings or changes must be approved by the original estate's surveyor.

The property must only be used as a private or professional residence. It cannot be used as a hospital, boarding house, for public meetings, or for letting out apartments.

The owner is not entitled to any right of light or air that would prevent the neighbouring land from being built on. No sand, gravel, or clay can be dug up from the land unless it is for immediate building work. The owner cannot claim a permanent right to light or air through windows that would block future development on the neighbouring estate.
